

Absolutely! Let's begin a fun, fictional sample chapter from the test book:

Marrying Early: Wisdom, Readiness, and Redemption

Author: waterman

Chapter One: When the World Says “Wait”

When Amina got engaged at twenty-one, the news traveled fast—mostly because everyone assumed it was a joke.

“You’re still a baby,” her aunt had said, half laughing, half frowning, as if love should only be for people with creaky knees and gray hairs. Even her college friends—who loved scrolling through engagement photos—acted as if she’d skipped a level in life’s game. Finish school. Travel. Build your brand. Then maybe—maybe—settle down.

But Amina didn’t feel like she was settling. She felt like she was building.

She wasn’t naïve. She knew marriage wasn’t all kisses and couple selfies. But she also knew that the same God who wrote love into the DNA of humanity had not set a minimum age requirement on commitment—He had set a heart requirement. Amina and Daniel had prayed, fasted, talked through fears, dreams, and laundry habits. They weren’t rushing. They were ready.

It just didn’t look like readiness to the world.

“The world will always give you its timeline, but God whispers in your spirit with His.”

Sometimes, marrying early isn’t about racing to the altar. It’s about choosing alignment over applause. It’s choosing to grow up together—not perfectly, not painlessly, but with purpose. Because when two hearts are surrendered to God, even youth becomes a canvas for something eternal.

And so, while others doubted, Amina danced. Not because she had it all figured out, but because she knew Who had figured her out—and called her ready.

Chapter Two: The Myth of Being “Too Young”

The phrase came from every direction:

“You’re too young to know what you want.”

It sounded wise. It felt safe. But it also felt hollow, especially to those who had wrestled with God in prayer, sought counsel, and prepared their hearts. Was youth truly the issue—or was it the fear of making a mistake?

Truth be told, age doesn't equal maturity. There are 35-year-olds who avoid commitment, and 22-year-olds who walk into marriage with humility and grace. God doesn't operate on the world's idea of "when." He looks at the posture of the heart.

"Don't let anyone look down on you because you are young, but set an example..."
—1 Timothy 4:12

It's not about defending youth—it's about understanding readiness.

Readiness isn't about having everything figured out. It's about being willing to grow, submit, and build with someone, trusting that God will do the work of maturing you both.

So no, you don't need ten years of solo adulthood to prepare for marriage. What you need is:

- A teachable spirit
- A God-centered foundation
- A heart that values covenant over convenience

Because the real danger isn't marrying young.

It's marrying without purpose.

Chapter Three: Growing Together, Not Apart

Marriage isn't the finish line. It's the starting gate.

When two young people marry, they don't enter with decades of wisdom—but they bring something just as valuable: a willingness to grow together.

That growth can be messy. One spouse learns how to budget while the other learns how to forgive. They argue over toothpaste caps and discover what "in sickness and in health" really means when someone gets COVID three months into marriage.

But here's the miracle: God doesn't require perfection to bless your journey.

He requires humility. And humility is easier to embrace when you're still being shaped.

"It's not about who changes faster. It's about who chooses grace more often."

Young couples get to grow side by side. They don't come with a lifetime of habits to unlearn. They build their rhythms together—learning how to pray, serve, apologize, dream, and even fail—side by side.

It's not always easy.

But the fruit of growing together, under the same roof and under the same God, is beautiful.

You become each other's witness.

Each other's cheerleader.

Each other's "I knew you when..."

And still chose you anyway.
